

Highlights

West Virginia wins 15th title with second-highest final point total in history: West Virginia senior Petra Zublasing swept the individual smallbore and air rifle competitions to lead the way for the top-ranked Mountaineers to secure their 15th NCAA rifle championship March 8 and 9 at Ohio State.

"Watching it is still way worse than competing," West Virginia head coach Jon Hammond said, himself a former Mountaineer who competed during the 2002-03 season and still shoots on the international level. "I have to try and relax and I tell my guys all the time they have to trust each other and I have to trust them to go out and do their thing. Our score is not the greatest score, but they toughed it out and they got the job done this weekend and that's all that matters."

West Virginia beat second-place Kentucky by nine points — 4,679 to 4,670 — in the aggregate scores from both competitions. Defending champion TCU finished third, with a score of 4,664.

West Virginia also won the team air rifle title March 9 by eight points (2,363 to 2,355) against Kentucky. TCU claimed the team smallbore title March 8 by a mere one point (2,317 to 2,316) against Alaska Fairbanks.

The triumph marked Hammond's second NCAA title at West Virginia. He won his first with the 2009 Mountaineers and coached West Virginia to the runner-up position behind Kentucky in 2011.

The smallbore competition, shot in the Lt. Hugh W. Wylie Range at Ohio State's Converse Hall, reflected title tension. The three top-ranked teams out of the field of eight NCAA qualifiers — West Virginia, Kentucky and TCU, respectively — all shot below season averages, with competitors and coaches citing NCAA pressure.

"You could cut the air with a chainsaw," Kentucky head coach Harry Mullins said.

The smallbore competition features 20 shots each from prone, standing and kneeling positions, respectively, at a distance of 50 feet. The top-eight shooters from Friday's three back-to-back sessions, or relays, advanced to the individual smallbore finals, which Zublasing won.

The 4,700-point barrier, first broken in competition two years ago and cemented with Kentucky's 2011 title total, has become the norm since, with top NCAA teams now shooting 4,700 or above during regular-season matches.

But, this weekend's two-day session at Ohio State wasn't the regular season.

"The three or four [top] teams, we went into this knowing we had the potential and the skills to do it," Mullins said March 9. "Especially yesterday, each team shot 240 shots and there were two points that separated No. 1 from No. 4 after all that shooting, eight hours later. I think most of us are prepared for that coming into this, but, at the same token, it's always a nerve-racking experience."

Zublasing is the first shooter to win both individual rifle titles in an NCAA rifle championship since 2001. Alaska Fairbanks' Matt Emmons was the last to do it. She's the first Mountaineer to win three career individual rifle titles — she was the defending individual air rifle champion — and this year's individual smallbore title made her the first Mountaineer to win one title in each discipline. She is the third Mountaineer to win two career air rifle titles.

"Petra is world-class," Hammond said. "She's simply one of the best in the world and to have someone like that makes NCAA competition better. But to have someone like that on your team is huge. She makes everyone on the team better."

Zublasing said teammate Taylor Ciotola actually made the Mountaineers better on the final day of competition, thanks to his dinner exhortation March 8 that he would rather compete for an NCAA title with no other group than his own teammates.

"I kind of think it was the feeling of you know, we did not do bad, we can do better tomorrow," she said. "Let's just do our best — each individual — for the team. Whatever you have to struggle, whatever you have to fight. So I think that made the difference."

After shooting her final match as a senior, Zublasing now concentrates on international-level competition. An Italian native and engineering major at West Virginia, she says she'll be sad to leave Morgantown and her teammates and friends behind.

"I'm glad to be a Mountaineer," she said. "I'm very proud."
